Singapore does not choose its digital-asset policy in isolation. Within a six-hour flight lie Hong Kong, Tokyo, Dubai, Bangkok, Kuala Lumpur and Jakarta, each with a regime of its own. The firms that MAS licenses or refuses can relocate to any of them within a quarter. The competition shapes MAS's behaviour in both directions. When Hong Kong reopened to retail crypto trading in 2023, MAS did not follow and said so. When Dubai offered licences on a timeline measured in weeks, MAS did not shorten its own and said that too. A regulator that is confident enough to lose business to its neighbours on purpose is a regulator whose choices a client can plan around. This chapter describes the neighbours, explains why clients compare Singapore most often with Hong Kong and sets out how the author answers that comparison.
